BURNING SMOKE.—We witnessed, on Saturday, the operation of a contrivance for consuming snoke which has been attached to the furnace of the towboat C. W. Hornbrook. The principle upon which it operates is that of the steam syphon. Hollow Theads of one and a half inch gas pipe are inserted at intervals of a foot in the fire front, barely passing through the metal. A line of half-inch pipe connected with the boilers passes along the T-heads, and into each of them a jet pipe the hole in which is about an eighth of an inch in diameter. These jets are connected with the line of steam pipe. When steam in the boilers is raised to a working capacity a valve is opened and steam injected. This creates a very powerful current of air through the Theads and above the fuel in the furnace, completely oxidizing the rising smoke and causing it to be almost entirely consumed. The flame of the fire is also driven far back under the boilers by the powerful current of air, thus applying the heat to a much greater surface in the Nail City.
